Analyst Summary

Semiconductor Rout Triggers Broad Market Selloff

U.S. equities suffered their steepest decline of 2026 on Friday, with tech-heavy indices bearing the brunt of a sector-wide semiconductor selloff. The Nasdaq 100 plunged 4.77%, while the S&P 500 dropped 2.64% and the Russell 2000 fell 3.47%. The VIX surged nearly 40% to 21.51, signaling a sharp increase in market anxiety.

Chip Sector Posts Worst Day Since 2020

The semiconductor complex experienced its most severe single-day drawdown since March 2020, with memory and compute-intensive names leading losses. Micron tumbled 13.25%, while AMD fell 10.86%, Intel dropped 11.28%, and Arm Holdings declined 12.84%. SanDisk plummeted 11.39%, and Broadcom shed 7.92%. Nvidia, the sector bellwether, fell 6.20%. The Memory subsector declined 11.23% relative to the Nasdaq, with 100% breadth participating in the downturn. Reports suggest the selloff was exacerbated by concerns over elevated valuations and potential profit-taking ahead of the highly anticipated SpaceX IPO.

Jobs Report Complicates Fed Outlook

A stronger-than-expected May jobs report—showing 172,000 additions versus 85,000 expected—pushed the 10-year Treasury yield up 6 basis points to 4.54%. The robust labor market data further diminishes prospects for near-term rate cuts under new Fed Chair Warsh, keeping monetary policy restrictive and pressuring growth-sensitive technology stocks. The dollar strengthened modestly, with EUR/USD down 0.80% and GBP/USD off 0.68%.

SpaceX IPO Looms; S&P Denies Fast-Track Entry

The $75 billion SpaceX IPO dominated headlines, with the S&P 500 Index Committee rejecting rule changes that would have allowed expedited inclusion for mega-cap IPOs. This decision delays an estimated $14 billion in passive inflows and may have contributed to weakness in speculative growth names. Separately, Google announced a $920 million monthly deal to purchase compute capacity from SpaceX's xAI data centers, while Meta reportedly considers a large equity raise to fund AI infrastructure.

Defensive Sectors Outperform

Amid the tech carnage, defensive sectors provided refuge. Healthcare and pharma advanced 1.08%, with top gainer The Cooper Companies up 8.58% and ABM Industries rising 6.67%. Banking and consumer sectors held relatively steady. Commodities sold off in tandem with risk assets, with gold down 3.35%, crude oil falling 3.00%, and Bitcoin declining 2.79%, suggesting broad-based deleveraging rather than a flight to traditional safe havens.
