Analyst Summary

Market Overview

U.S. equities closed mixed Friday in a session marked by sharp sector rotation and divergent performance across major indices. The Nasdaq 100 advanced 0.75% and the Russell 2000 gained 0.71%, while the S&P 500 ended essentially flat (-0.01%) and the Dow edged up 0.14%. The VIX rose 4.50% to 19.74, suggesting underlying investor caution despite positive headline numbers.

Memory Sector Leads Historic Rally

The standout theme was an explosive rally in memory stocks, with the sector surging 10.32% on 100% breadth. SanDisk led all major gainers with a stunning 21.52% advance to $2,335, while Micron soared 15.81%, adding $165.64 per share to close at $1,213.56. The moves came amid reports of deepening memory supply constraints—Apple is reportedly raising prices on MacBooks and iPads due to the "memory crunch." Samsung's announcement of massive chip and AI investment (roughly one-third of South Korea's GDP) further fueled the rally, though it also contributed to the KOSPI plunging 8% as foreigners dumped shares.

Notably, memory stocks showed elevated put/call ratios (1.73), indicating investors are buying protection even as they chase the rally—a sign of hedged bullishness rather than complacency.

Mega-Cap Tech Under Pressure

In stark contrast, hyperscalers and mega-cap tech sold off sharply. Apple dropped 6.15%, its worst daily performance in the data set, while Microsoft fell 3.45%, extending what MarketWatch described as a "historic June rout" tied to investor concerns over heavy AI spending. Amazon (-3.14%), Meta (-2.68%), and Nvidia (-1.59%) also declined. The Hyperscalers sector fell 2.65% with just 14% breadth, signaling broad-based weakness.

Other Notable Movers

Beyond memory, Bio-Techne (+20.08%) and BlackBerry (+19.95%) posted strong gains, while DPC surged 42.06% to lead all gainers. Banking and pharma sectors showed quiet strength, each rising over 1% on solid breadth.

Cross-Asset Signals

The 10-year Treasury yield dipped modestly to 4.39%, while oil plunged 3.77% to $69.21—levels not seen since before the Iran conflict, per WSJ commentary. Bitcoin fell 2.37%. Chicago Fed President Goolsbee noted inflation remains "too high," though Fed Vice Chair Williams sees price pressures easing, keeping rate expectations in focus. Bond ETF inflows surged as investors hunt for yield, with BlackRock suggesting the "market is sniffing out something."

The session underscored a market in transition, rotating from AI infrastructure plays into memory and cyclical value.
