Analyst Summary

Sector Rotation Accelerates as Chip Weakness Deepens

U.S. equity markets closed mixed Friday as a sharp selloff in semiconductor and AI infrastructure stocks overshadowed gains in consumer technology and healthcare. The Nasdaq 100 fell 1.09%, weighed down by heavy losses in memory and chip equipment makers, while the S&P 500 dipped just 0.05% and the Russell 2000 edged 0.07% higher. The VIX declined 2.54% to 18.41, suggesting the pullback was orderly rather than panic-driven.

Memory and Chip Infrastructure Under Pressure

The semiconductor complex suffered its worst day in months, with the Memory sector plunging 11.35%. Micron dropped 6.69%, SanDisk cratered 10.46%, and Coherent fell 6.55%. Nvidia declined 1.64%, AMD lost 2.06%, and Broadcom slid 3.67%. Networking and interconnect names fell 4.74%, with positioning data showing elevated put-call ratios (1.11) and rising short interest (5.3%), pointing to conviction selling. The broad Semiconductors/Compute sector declined 3.54%, though notably its put-call ratio of 0.53 suggests the decline wasn't accompanied by hedging demand—flows appear measured rather than panicked.

Big Tech Bifurcates; SaaS Surges

In sharp contrast, select mega-cap tech names rallied. Microsoft surged 5.71%, Apple gained 3.14%, Amazon rose 2.50%, and Meta added 1.36%. The divergence highlights rotation within technology—investors appeared to favor established hyperscalers and consumer platforms over chipmakers. Alphabet's 2.19% decline bucked the trend. Separately, the SaaS sector soared 6.77%, though the elevated put-call ratio (1.15) and 5.8% short interest suggest hedging demand remains robust despite the advance.

Fed Pivot Supports Rates and Gold

Federal Reserve hawk Neel Kashkari shifted his stance, now projecting one rate hike this year—a notable reversal that underscores the central bank's ongoing vigilance under Chair Kevin Warsh. Despite this hawkish signal and a pop in inflation data, bond yields declined, with the 10-year Treasury falling 2 basis points to 4.37%. MarketWatch noted that "the Fed's tough talk under Warsh is helping" anchor inflation expectations. Gold rallied 1.37% to $4,103, benefiting from safe-haven flows and real rate dynamics. Oil tumbled 2.34% to $70.24, with reports citing prices back to pre-Iran-war levels.

Biotech and Retail Bright Spots

Top gainers included SELLAS Life Sciences (+17.66%), Lucid (+15.63%), and Moderna (+12.59%), as the Pharma/Healthcare sector surged 3.41% with broad 88% breadth. The positioning data (put-call 1.32) suggests the advance is heavily hedged, with protection still well-bid.
