Analyst Summary

Overview

U.S. equities rallied on the final trading day of June, with technology leading a broad advance. The Nasdaq 100 surged 2.25%, outpacing the S&P 500's 1.18% gain and the Dow's more modest 0.59% advance. Small-caps lagged, with the Russell 2000 effectively flat (+0.01%), highlighting continued preference for mega-cap growth. The VIX edged down slightly to 17.58, consistent with a calm risk-on session.

Sector Performance and Notable Movers

The AI and semiconductor complex drove market gains, with memory chips leading the charge. The Memory sector jumped 4.38%, showing 100% breadth and exhibiting signs of a short-squeeze rebound according to positioning data (1.59 put/call ratio, 6.5% short float). Alphabet stood out among mega-caps with a 4.96% surge, while AMD gained 3.43% and Amazon rose 3.20%. Networking and semiconductor compute also posted strong gains of 2.80% and 2.72% respectively, both showing bullish positioning characteristics.

Microsoft bucked the trend, falling 1.18%, while Apple dipped 0.72%. The consumer sector underperformed broadly, declining 0.78%, though still outpacing its benchmark.

Among top gainers, Ouster (OUST) soared 28.68%, Iridium Communications (IRDM) jumped 25.44% on news of an $8 billion acquisition by Rocket Lab, and SELLAS Life Sciences (SLS) rallied 24.70%. FuelCell Energy (FCEL) and ViaSat (VSAT) also posted gains exceeding 23%.

Cross-Asset Signals

The dollar strengthened notably, pushing USD/JPY to 162.32—a 40-year low for the yen that's testing Japanese authorities' tolerance. EUR/USD and GBP/USD both declined modestly. Central banks are reportedly preparing to reduce dollar holdings for the first time, per recent surveys—a potential long-term headwind for the greenback despite near-term strength.

Gold held near $4,000, up marginally, but faces its worst quarter in 13 years. Bitcoin declined 1.31% to $59,211, extending recent weakness. Treasury yields remained stable at 4.37% for the 10-year, with the T-bill curve steepening slightly.

Outlook Considerations

Tariff concerns resurfaced as former President Trump threatened 100% tariffs on digital taxes, adding uncertainty for tech. Meanwhile, investors await U.S.-Iran talks and key economic data, including the upcoming June jobs report. SpaceX's fast-tracked addition to the Nasdaq-100 could drive significant ETF-related buying flows in coming sessions.
