Analyst Summary

Market Overview

U.S. equities closed lower Tuesday, with technology stocks bearing the brunt of selling pressure amid renewed concerns about AI infrastructure valuations. The Nasdaq 100 tumbled 1.77%, significantly underperforming the Dow's 0.25% decline and the S&P 500's 0.45% drop. The VIX rose 3.60% to 16.13, reflecting a modest uptick in hedging demand, though volatility remains contained by historical standards.

The tech selloff was concentrated in semiconductors and memory stocks, which experienced conviction selling. AMD plunged 6.51%, Intel cratered 9.66%, Micron dropped 4.71%, and Arm fell 6.77%. The Memory sector posted its worst performance, down 5.98%, with elevated put/call ratios (1.20) and short interest suggesting traders are positioned for further downside. SanDisk's 7.26% decline and Coherent's 6.43% drop rounded out the chip sector carnage.

The selloff may have been catalyzed by reports that Amazon plans to raise $25 billion through a bond sale, sparking fresh debate about capital intensity in AI infrastructure and whether returns will justify the massive spending. AI-related debt reportedly sold off sharply on the news, raising financing cost concerns across the ecosystem.

Divergence and Defensives

Not all sectors suffered. Healthcare and Pharma rallied 1.94% with broad 88% participation, led by Crinetics Pharmaceuticals, which soared 98.74% to top the market's gainers list. Agios Pharmaceuticals added 17.71%, while Viking Therapeutics climbed 8.83%. SaaS stocks also outperformed, rising 1.59% with 89% breadth, signaling rotation into growth outside of chips.

Among mega-caps, Meta surged 2.55%, Amazon gained 0.75%, and Microsoft edged up 0.54%, showing resilience in hyperscalers despite AI concerns. Nvidia bucked the chip trend with a 0.71% gain.

Commodities and Rates

Crude oil jumped 2.77% to $72.39 following reports that the U.S. launched strikes on Iran and canceled its oil export license, injecting geopolitical risk premium. Gold fell 1.08% and Bitcoin slipped 0.96% as risk appetite cooled. The 10-year Treasury yield climbed 5 basis points to 4.53%, suggesting investors remain cautious about inflation and the Fed's path forward, with no immediate rate cuts priced in.
