Analyst Summary

Market Overview

U.S. equities closed mixed on Friday as technology stocks diverged sharply beneath the surface. The S&P 500 edged down 0.05%, while the Nasdaq 100 declined 1.09%, weighed by a selloff in semiconductor and cloud infrastructure names. The Dow slipped 0.09%, but small-caps outperformed with the Russell 2000 gaining 0.07%. The VIX fell 2.54% to 18.41, suggesting market stress remained contained despite tech sector turbulence.

Semiconductor Shakeout Amid Fed Hawkishness

The session's defining narrative was a violent rotation within the semiconductor complex. Memory stocks surged, with the sector gaining 10.3% despite Micron plunging 6.69%—a rare divergence suggesting idiosyncratic pressure on the chipmaker. Meanwhile, SanDisk collapsed 10.46%, and other compute-focused names suffered: Broadcom fell 3.67%, AMD lost 2.06%, Nvidia declined 1.64%, and Arm dropped 3.87%.

Positioning data reveals heavy put hedging across memory (P/C ratio 2.41) and networking (1.88), indicating investors remain defensive even as these segments rally. Hyperscalers and cloud infrastructure names sold off 2.65%, with bearish positioning (-0.88 sentiment) and minimal put demand (P/C 1.09), suggesting an orderly but sustained de-risking.

Monetary Policy Takes Center Stage

Federal Reserve developments dominated headlines. Minneapolis Fed President Neel Kashkari shifted his outlook to project one rate hike this year, marking a notable hawkish pivot. The news comes amid reports that Fed Chair Warsh's tough stance on inflation is helping anchor long-term expectations, even as recent inflation data "pops." The 10-year Treasury yield fell modestly to 4.37%, down 0.46%, reflecting complex cross-currents between inflation concerns and growth uncertainty.

Standout Movers and Cross-Asset Signals

Mega-cap tech showed resilience: Microsoft surged 5.71%, Apple gained 3.14%, Amazon rose 2.50%, and Meta added 1.36%. News that SpaceX will join the Nasdaq-100 on July 7 fueled enthusiasm around passive fund inflows.

Among top market gainers, biotech stood out with SELLAS Life Sciences (+17.66%), Moderna (+12.59%), and ImmunityBio (+11.81%) leading, while Lucid Group jumped 15.62%.

Gold rallied 1.20% to $4,096, signaling safe-haven demand amid geopolitical tensions following confirmed U.S. retaliatory strikes on Iran. Crude oil fell 3.74% to $69.23, likely reflecting supply concerns. Bitcoin edged up 0.41%, while the dollar was stable across major pairs.
