Analyst Summary

Semiconductor Rout Drives Broad Selloff

U.S. equities suffered a sharp decline on June 6, with the tech-heavy Nasdaq 100 plunging 4.77% in its largest point drop on record. The S&P 500 shed 2.64%, erasing roughly $1.8 trillion in market value, while the Dow fell 1.35%. The VIX surged nearly 40% to 21.51, reflecting a sharp uptick in investor anxiety.

Chip Sector Posts Worst Day Since 2020

The catalyst for the selloff was a historic collapse in semiconductor stocks, which posted their worst day since March 2020. Memory chipmakers bore the brunt of the damage, with Micron (-13.25%), Arm (-12.84%), SanDisk (-11.39%), and Intel (-11.28%) all suffering double-digit losses. AMD fell 10.86%, while Broadcom dropped 7.92% despite recently breaking records—underscoring that even exceptional performance couldn't satisfy investors demanding "perfection" in AI plays. Nvidia declined 6.20% as the broader AI chip sector showed deep cracks, with sector indices revealing Memory down 11.23%, Semiconductors/Compute down 10.92%, and Networking/Interconnect off 8.62%.

The selloff appears driven by mounting concerns over stretched valuations and potentially weaker-than-expected demand, compounded by headlines suggesting Big Tech firms like Meta may increasingly issue equity to finance the estimated $820 billion AI infrastructure boom—potentially diluting existing shares and raising questions about capital intensity.

Defensive Rotation and Macro Crosscurrents

In contrast, defensive sectors outperformed sharply. Pharma/Healthcare gained 1.08%, with top gainer argenx SE (ARGX) up 5.82% and The Cooper Companies (COO) rallying 8.58%. Industrials also found support, with ABM Industries (ABM) advancing 6.67% and ArcBest (ARCB) climbing 6.17%. Banking and Consumer sectors held up relatively well, declining only modestly or posting slight gains.

A stronger-than-expected jobs report pressured rate-cut expectations, with the 10-year Treasury yield rising 6 basis points to 4.54%. Headlines noted the hot employment data puts Fed cuts "further out of reach" as new Chair Warsh navigates early policy tests. The dollar strengthened modestly, with EUR/USD and GBP/USD both down roughly 0.7–0.8%.

Cross-Asset Signals and SpaceX IPO Buzz

Risk assets sold off broadly: Gold fell 3.10%, crude oil dropped 2.69%, and Bitcoin declined 2.39% to four-month lows amid a 13-day Bitcoin ETF outflow streak totaling $4.3 billion. Some market observers speculated that Bitcoin may be serving as a liquidity source for private AI investments.

Meanwhile, the SpaceX IPO dominated headlines, with Wall Street giants securing roles and analysts projecting ambitious revenue growth. However, the S&P 500 Index Committee confirmed it will not change inclusion rules for mega-cap IPOs, meaning SpaceX faces a lengthy wait to join the index and unlock an estimated $14 billion in passive inflows—potentially dampening some of the initial enthusiasm.
